

A significant reason for my subscription to XM radio is that there are very few stations that can be received in my area. I will travel from my home to Philadelphia or New York City and without XM would not be able to get a traffic report until I'm close to the either of the cities, making route planning difficult. It seems outrageous that the FCC would consider not allowing me access to this information because I choose to live in a rural area. Why is this even up for discussion?
